ABOUT: “Children Of War,” by Bryan Single, was filmed inside the war zone of northern Uganda and follows the story of a group of former child soldiers as they undergo a process of trauma therapy and emotional healing. It has received numerous international awards, including the prestigious Cinema for Peace Award for Justice. It is one of only a handful of films to screen before world leaders in the historic General Assembly Hall of the United Nations. The film has also been recognized as a powerful communication tool on the subjects of child combatants, conflict resolution, and international law, and has been presented before decision-makers in the European Parliament, the International Criminal Court, and in UN and EU branches around the world.
Single’s work has appeared on the Discovery Channel, PBS, and the BBC.

Jane Ekayu is the Founder and Executive Director of Children of Peace, Uganda. She has extensive experience as a child trauma therapist and has worked to help thousands of child soldiers returning from captivity reintegrate back into the community. She is also an international spokesperson on the issues of child soldiers and war trauma recovery, and has captivated audiences in the United Nations General Assembly Hall, the International Criminal Court, at the ICC Review Conference in Kampala, the Amnesty International Film Festival, the Vancouver International Film Festival, and many others.
